Many dissidents who are redpilled on the race question see IQ as this amazing moral good which solves all problems. Race realists tend to idolize IQ and its effects when they really shouldn't. IQ is real, heritable and stable. That said, having a very low or very high IQ both come with downsides. Having a population with a very high or very low average IQ can both be equally problematic in their own way, in terms of having a functional society. Everyone, or even a lot of people having an IQ of 150 is no more desirable than everyone having an IQ of 80. There has to be a bell curve; there has to be an average, with divergences in both directions and to different degrees. If not, society cannot function.

You may be asking what this was to do with vaccines, and in fact a lot actually. Autism, the big boogieman of the anti-vax movement, used to be understood as a disease. Today, is understood as simply a mutation, offering different strengths and weaknesses to those who have it. But like IQ, autism is neither good nor bad absolutely. It depends on the individual and also on how many people in a society have it. Autism is a spectrum. The effects can be crippling to the point of non-functioning, or can enhance the autist with great intellectual abilities or talent with little effort, unavailable to normal people even with great study and practice. The anti-vax movement I think wrongly pathologizes a condition which is neither bad nor good in itself, just as the obsession with IQ among race realists damages the scientific nature of IQ. Some high IQ people are sociopaths, some low IQ are criminals; some high IQ people are geniuses who produce great things for society, some low IQ people are hard working grunts. Similarly with autism.

One of the many reasons the White race has been so successful in its history of building societies and all it has produced is precisely because our average IQ is at a perfect balance, with just enough geniuses, grunts and averages to produce a functional community.

Speaking of vaccines, a word is in order about one of the founders of the anti-vax movement, RFK junior.

> Kennedy made his name in the anti-vaccine movement in 2005, when he published a story alleging a massive conspiracy regarding thimerosal, a mercury-based preservative that had been removed from all childhood vaccines except for some variations of the flu vaccine in 2001. In his piece, Kennedy completely ignored an Institute of Medicine immunization safety review on thimerosal published the previous year; he's also ignored the nine studies funded or conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention that have taken place since 2003.

This is one of many examples of RFK leaving out crucial facts to vaccine information. But the anti-vax movement could rightly be called a cult. Adherence to it is based on blind faith in those who tell parents what makes them feel good regardless of the truth. It shields people from their family members trying to lead them astray and it regards those trained in medicine and who've sworn an oath to do no harm as the enemy. You have to listen to us after all because, those damn doctors are in on the conspiracy. But we, random people making money off your fears, we really do care about you. The anti-vax is domestic biological terrorism, fear profiteering, kills people, spreads diseases and should be censored by the state. Also, we need Medicare for All.
